

Acute Coronary Syndrome Priority Setting Partnership Survey

Do you have questions about treatment and management of heart attacks that could be answered by research?

This is an opportunity for you to help.

If you are a person who has previously had a heart attack, or cared for someone who has previously had a heart attack, and are older than eighteen, we would like to hear from you.

What are we doing?

We are asking people who have a lived experience of heart attacks, their families and friends, as well as healthcare professionals who look after heart attack patients, to help us identify the top ten questions that they want answered by heart research. This will help guide heart research and make sure that researchers focus on the needs of people living with the condition.

What do I have to do?

Tell us the questions you have about heart attacks that you would like to see answered by research. Your questions in your own words are what we are looking for. The most important thing is to draw on your own experience and what is important to you.

Who are we?

The Acute Coronary Syndrome Priority Setting Partnership is a collaboration of clinicians and researchers from Royal Perth Hospital, University of Western Australia and Curtin University.
